Comments: The barn is a listed building, however if one of the barns has been allowed a wood burning fire it seems strange that the other has not. If the flue from the fire is replacing the soil pipe then this will cause very little difference to the appearance of the outside of the building so causing no change to the fabric of an historical building. This past winter was extremely cold with howling winds causing snow drifts and so can understand the need for some form of heat that is not powered by electricity in any way because of the power cuts we also get in this area. As for the door if it is causing structural damage to a listed building then I would assume this would be taken into account in your decision as long as the original quoins can still be seen..
