Travellers Rest, Stanley

Site within the Stanley Conservation Area and although unlisted is a 16th century vernacular building of historic significance with in the centre of the village. The stone and tile building is part of a consistent building line facing the road and there is a scale and rhythm to the buildings and arrangement of their openings. The detailing to the windows, the stone surrounds and evidence of building extension are all parts of the building's legibility which add to the building's character.

The proposal to add a Victorian-style metal and glass canopy to the front elevation will introduce a substantial new structure to the frontage and be a prominent addition. It will obscure views of the traditional form and appearance of the building and jut out in front of the building line of adjoining properties. These type of features are more common in 19th century, urban streetscapes and rear elevations. The proposal will be harmful to the character and appearance of the Conservation Area.
