1, the site is far to close to the A50. Helicopters taking off and landing and generally flying around on tests will provide a constant distraction to drives. Not just drivers outside the proposed assembly site, but for quite a few miles on the A50. One of the busiest roads in the UK. So to now install a continual distraction to drivers it a most dangerous and stupid thing to do. You couldn't place the factory in a more unsuitable location for this reason alone. If it is allowed to go ahead, and there is a crash of some sort, causing holdups for motorists and injury to road users.....because they were distracted by helicopters taking off, landing, generally flying in the area, then who ever allowed them to do just that alongside the very busy road would need to be responsible for causing the accidents. Pleural because there will be many. On an already accident prone stretch of the road.

2, all the people living under the constant proposed flight paths purchased their homes with a large factor of peace and quiet. This factor is now under great threat. Disturbing all residents who were there first. A noisy business like this should be placed either in the middle of nowhere or in a highly industrious area where their noise will blend in and not become a nuisance and disturb the peace.

3, this point echos the above point but from a pollution angle.
