Comments: Building new houses on green fields, particularly when the existing town infrastructure is struggling to accommodate the current population, raises significant concerns. The strain on roads, already overloaded, will only worsen with the influx of new residents, leading to increased traffic congestion and longer commute times. Additionally, the pressure on essential services such as healthcare, evidenced by difficulties in securing appointments with doctors, will only intensify, jeopardizing the well-being of both existing and new residents. Furthermore, the prospect of seeing new houses erected in close proximity to their homes understandably distresses local residents, who value the green spaces that contribute to their quality of life. Instead of further urban sprawl, efforts should be directed towards revitalizing existing communities and improving infrastructure to ensure sustainable growth and maintain the character of the town.
